

inning, Ryan in the meantime being the only man to reach first base on safe batting. Hague went to first on called balls' Anson made a wild throw to second off Collins. hit, in attempting to make a double play. Hastings followed with a safe hit to centre field, which Hines muffed, and Hague scored. Peters lost a chance to make a double play by letting Fulmer's hit get through him, and Collins scored on Hines' bad throw home. Somerville flew out to Glenn, and Peters and Barnes closed the innings by a neat double play. The home nine went out in one, two, three order the next three innings. The Chicagos failed to do anything with the stick—for the first six innings, not a single base hit was made, and Glenn and Barnes were the only men to reach first base, which they did on called balls. In the seventh inning the Whites broke the ice, and it looked as though they might succeed in turning the game in their favor, but the fates and the good fielding of the Louisvilles were against them, and they had to content themselves with only two runs, which proved to be the only runs they were to make during the game. Peters led off with a hard drive to right field, and took second on Chapman's slow handling. McVey followed with another in the same direction, and Peters scored, Mac taking second on a passed ball, reaching third on Anson's out at first, and scored on White's hit to Fulmer, who attempted to put him out at home, and failed. Hines hit hard to Somerville who closed the inning and the run-getting for the Whites by a neat double play. The Whites went out as they came to the bat in the eighth and ninth innings. The playing of the home nine was the best they have shown for some time, and the players, as well as the spectators, were highly elated at the result. Appended is

The fallacy of the idea that games where but few base hits are made is owing to superior or artful pitching is in the game to-day clearly illustrated. The Chicago Club, generally recognized as the best and most scientific batting nine in the country, made but two base hits, and sent but thirty-one men to bat, while the Louisville Club sending thirty-five men to bat made but three, or a grand total of sixty-five men to the bat with only five base hits. Here, then, according to the accepted theory, is a game nearly perfect as regards skillful pitching, while the true cause of the very few base hits made is due more to the dead, mushy ball used, than to any unusual excellence in the pitching department. It is in such games as this that the "phenomenon" is born. The eleventh game between these two clubs will be played Monday.

THE NATIONAL GAME.

WHITE STOCKINGS VS. LOUISVILLE.

Spectal Dispatch to The Tribune.
LOUISVILLE, Ky., Aug. 5.—The Louisvilles have finally won a game from the Chicagos, and every body here is happy. A glance at the score will show that the visitors were outplayed both at the bat and in the field, though the batting on both sides was so very tame that it hardly deserves to be called any batting at all. A heavy shower fell just before the game commenced, which rendered the grounds very muddy and slippery, and this, together with the very dead and mushy ball that was used, accounts in a measure for the weak hitting. The Chicagos won the toss and went to the field. The first innings yielded two runs to the Louisvilles on errors of Barnes and Anson, followed by Hastings' two-base hit after two men were out. No more runs were made until the sixth
